

Support is available to help them towards positive change

For advice contact the Intervention and Support Program team:

WAISP@police.wa.gov.au

1300 491 711 (8am – 4pm, Mon – Fri)

WA.gov.au/positivechange

For more information
scan the QR code

For police attendance call 131 444 or triple zero (000) in case of an emergency

The Intervention and Support Program is led by the WA Police Force, working with a team who provide specialist advice to support the participant.

Are you worried someone is on the wrong path?

Signs to look out for

Are you worried a relative, friend or someone you know may be heading down a pathway towards violent extremism?

When radical or extreme views lead to violence or support for violence, help is available.

Signs that a person may be on a path towards violent extremism can include:

- ▶ A change in their appearance.
- ▶ Being more detached or withdrawn than usual.
- ▶ Viewing and sharing hateful, violent or extremist content.
- ▶ Isolating themselves from friends or family.
- ▶ Showing intense ideological, political or religious interest.

How you can help

Talking to someone about their changing behaviour can make a big difference in early intervention. Simply listening without judgement can help them feel accepted and connected. Positive communication can divert them from the dangers of violent extremism.

Trust your instincts. If you're worried someone might use violence to support extreme views, professional help is available.

Help is available

The Intervention and Support Program helps people who may be at risk of harming others or themselves because of their radical or extreme views.

The program focuses on prevention and early intervention supporting the individual to disengage from the path of violent extremism.

It is free, voluntary and consent based.

A program team member can provide advice and connect you with appropriate services.

To find out about the program, visit

 wa.gov.au/positivechange

